CREATING ‘SHOPPING EXPERIENCES’ DRIVES SALES

The world of retail has gone through many ups and downs in how, and what, consumers buy over the past decade. So, too, has the art and framing industry. No longer can a business owner open their brick-and-mortar location, do some advertising and then wait for the people to walk in their door. Today’s consumer is looking for the ultimate shopping experience and are attracted to those that offer a “WOW” factor. While shoppers today are bombarded with constant opportunities to spend their dollars, there still are a large number of those a bit reluctant, post-pandemic. Forrester Research says that around 72% of retail sales are being made in physical store locations this year. That is a huge bump from the Covid-19 days. While malls in general are struggling immensely, strip malls, where many in the art and framing are located, are...

From both the perspective of retailers and consumers, the environment for selling and buying consumer goods is a mess. Dazed by rapid technological innovation while crushed by Covid and squeezed by inflationary pressures, the traditional retail experience has been shaped into a shadow of its former self.

Staffing among widespread brick-and-mortar retailers’ employee levels are way down. As discounters remain smitten with self-service check-outs more upscale retailers struggle to maintain an adequate sales floor. Low body counts and the lack of training in product knowledge and customer service—let alone salesmanship—have cast a pall over much of the industry.

As these same retailers seek and derive a growing percentage of sales from online efforts, the gaps in consumer experience widens. For many products, the readiness of product information seems to be an invincible catalyst relegating the in-store experience to a distant second place. The store is no longer the preferred venue to shop, learn and research, rather its just for buying.

Many conventional retailers are solely seeking transactions. Their notion of building a brand is only skin deep these days. In stark comparison, the art and framing industry, on every level, is as much about nurturing client relationships as it is ringing the cash register. A gallery of framers’ ability to survive is supported, in part, on the conversion of one-time customers into repeat clients. So much of what conveyed and felt through the customer’s experience dictate the strength of a brand. Personable, well-trained staff makes an immediate difference and will continue to separate our industry from the rest of the retail pack.

CREATING SHOPPING EXPERIENCES

business have their locations, are also facing issues. Investment banking company UBS estimates that some 40k to 50k retailers will close their doors by 2028. The key to avoiding this may be to offer people a compelling reason to buy from you, beyond just presenting great products and services. Today’s retailers must remove the idea that shopping is just an errand and turn it into an event.

At Four Corners Custom Framing, located in the heart of South Tampa, FL, owner Chad McCluskey says he has found that the best way to make people feel like their visit and purchase is an event is to get them involved in the design process for their framing. By providing a pleasant environment and having personable staff, he is allowing the customer to feel that the artwork hanging in their home is something that they creatively made their own. “We keep the design process fun by encouraging the client to explore different style frames and mat textures and movement,” he says. “Our gallery is always playing relaxing uptempo music which invites the client to have a good time. It’s picture framing—it’s supposed to be fun!”

Also, since people are now more comfortable travelling, they have been looking to Mr. McCluskey’s business to extend that excitement by getting their new artwork custom framed. “Most of my clients were excited to have the opportunity to travel again. And as a result, our frame gallery was involved in art acquisitions and custom framing of the art that was purchased during their travels.”

Four Corners Custom Framing is located in Tampa, FL.

Four Corners has also been able to extend their reach beyond the art world by participating in fundraising events like golf tournaments, as well as framing many jerseys for auctions from the Tampa Bay Lightning and Tampa Bay Buccaneers.

Expanding one’s customer base helps to increase sales and offers opportunities to get them involved in the design of their framing order. “Working with other local businesses has helped to grow our base organically by providing framing services for local artists and interior designers. We also open up the gallery for the artists and designers to meet their clients. There is a pretty hopping sports bar across the street from the shop. I simply framed a jersey and put it on display in the window. Lots of jersey orders followed that up.”

In the larger retail arena, some brands are creating experiential events for consumers, such as over-the-top store designs like Louis Vuitton’s Paris boutique turning their entire storefront into their iconic leather bags, to traveling exhibits and pop-ups. Adopting some of those principles, albeit on a smaller scale, can help the art and framing industry create similar events. Kasandra Ulchar, owner of the Charlotte, NC-based Applewood Framing in business for 21 years, says that showing people that your business is unique, is important.

“I want the experience of coming to Applewood to be different than a Big Box, or a stereotypical frameshop,” she says. “My shop itself is pretty tiny, so during the pandemic, I redressed the outside parking lot area in order to create a ‘sitting room’ while I worked with one client at a time. We added a white fence and our favorite art and framing quotes inside frames on the fence for interest. It attracts people going to other businesses in my plaza, and I see people taking photographs of the wall often. It has also increased my walk-in business, as I have

Creating a fun and inviting space is vital. “I have leaned into the tiny shop size by making it a dazzling jewel box to step inside, and consumers have responded very positively. There are a lot of unique mouldings, and I have always played up the fun of finding the perfect frame for their artwork, no matter what it may be. By being excited and engaged with every piece a client brings in, and making sure the excitement is contagious, clients get caught up in the art of framing.”

“I do think one of the things the pandemic did was make consumers much more aware that their shopping practices could help, or hinder, small local businesses,” Ms. Ulchar says. “In the last few years, I have heard from new clients that they want to support local business many more times than I have heard that in the previous 18 of our 21 years. They are more cognizant that if they don’t support local, there won’t BE local businesses.”

She says that keeping an open mind to retail trends and consumer buying habits can be a good jumping point for changes that may help a gallery and frameshop. “When I was in a bigger space (pre-recession) I hosted artist shows in the gallery, but it never really grew my client base, which was disappointing for the expense and time it took to put together. I am planning a few pop-ups in the next few years with a photography store, but more of an open-house style. I think pop-ups in the framing industry can be difficult as you can’t really show the breadth of what framers are able to do in that environment.”

But increasing opportunity and exposure to bring in sales is the ultimate end-game. “Overall, the pandemic brought about a welcome change in how people viewed custom framing and how much it finishes a home,” Ms. Ulchar says. “There is more awareness and more perceived value to it, and I really enjoy introducing so many people to custom framing.”

Rachel H. Stephens, a partner at Wally Workman Gallery in Austin, TX, says that its gallery receptions that still offer collectors an exciting way to socialize and see new work. And while some may be slow to attend these days, there are more people feeling comfortable. “Sales have, of course, dipped a bit post-pandemic but not enough to speak of,” she says. “We still hold art openings, etc., to celebrate our artists’ hard work but we find most of our clients like to purchase outside of events. Event wariness is a holdover from the pandemic but has more to do with people prioritizing their time differently vs. health. Events stopped being a sales driver for us about 15 or 20 years ago.”

“I think the mortgage crisis in 2009 was a turning point. People stopped being showy with their purchases and preferred to purchase more privately,” Ms. Stephens says. “And it became so much easier to do so with the internet’s advances. We also got better at our communication with clients before a show opens, so pre-sales have gone up and those were probably sales that would have happened at openings prior.”

At FRAME Custom Picture Framing in San Francisco, store manager Sluggo says that creating your community’s go-to space for all their art and framing is what has helped him grow over the past 32 years. “We’ve been in business since 1991 and have cultivated a relatively simple plan: be as knowledgeable as possible regarding both the artwork and the framing. I’ve been framing since 1984 and the rest of my staff have at least 20 years experience. Some of our staff are also artists that show in galleries around the world and customers are often made to feel more comfortable knowing that we are familiar with the artist and the best way to present the work.

“We do not, however, know everything and if we make a mistake (we are humans after all) we do everything in our power to correct it—at no cost to the customer. We stand behind everything we do and have done. Also we’re friendly, which sounds like a no-brainer, yet you’d be surprised how many new customers come to us because other shops were rude to them.”

The pandemic, not only changed buying habits, but also how people live and work. “We do now see people out seemingly enjoying coming in to frame their artwork,” he says. “People seem more comfortable and not as freaked out as they were back in 2020. Business though has actually slowed a bit post-pandemic. Don’t get me wrong, we’re still doing very well, as every year since 2019 has been our best yet and 2023 is on track to continue that trend. Our customers were practically beating down the door the minute our 60-day mandatory shutdown ended in May 2020. Two months of being homebound staring at their walls had pushed them to frame more art.

“Also a large portion of San Francisco is now working from home, and this may have prompted many to re-decorate. We’re a small, five employee shop and we had to hire to appointment only and have stayed that way,” Sluggo says. “It means we only have one or two customers at a time in the store along with two employees. People have differing levels of stress about this and we meet everyone at their comfort level: if they want us to mask-up, we certainly will. All employees are fully vaccinated as well.”

“In my 40 years of retail custom picture framing experience, retail custom frameshops and galleries work at cross purposes,” he says. “We try to frame a customer’s work as correctly as possible for the piece, ie. museum quality glass/acrylic, acid-free backing and matboards, which is not cheap. Galleries, for the most part cannot, or will not, spend that kind of money as it cuts into their bottomline. I totally get that. Additionally, they figure why spend tons of money on the framing when a customer often buys pieces for the artwork, then re-frames it in their preferred style? We’re called in occasionally to help a gallery with a ‘framing emergency’ and they never want to pay our prices. Again, I have zero hard feelings about that as I understand.”

Art and framing is not just an everyday expense for consumers and making their shopping experience notable lets them know that their business is appreciated. Looking to work with other businesses may help to boost exposure and brand recognition, as well as looking to areas outside of one’s local area. A recent trend has been to hold pop-ups in vacant retail stores, allowing customers in a new area to experience what the gallery or frameshop has to offer. And, as these closed retail locations sit empty, negotiating a good price with the building owner is more appealing for both parties. This has been in the broader retail world for quite some time, and the art and framing industry can glean some strategies from it. Such as, Barneys department store on Madison Avenue in New York which closed February 2020, was transformed in 2022 into an experiential Louis Vuitton Malletier traveling exhibit titled “200 Trunks, 200 Visionaries.”

FRAMING TECHNIQUES

PROTECTING AND FRAMING PASTELS

By Dr. Jennifer Booth
Charcoal and powdered minerals, such as ochre and chalk, have long been used to produce art. We see this from Paleolithic cave paintings such as those at Lascaux in the south of France, to preparatory drawings using natural red, black, and white chalk by renaissance artists such as Leonardo da Vinci and Michelangelo.

By the latter part of the 17th century, pastels we would be more familiar with today, in a wide range of colour hues, were beginning to be available. With the increase of colour options, the style of their use became less graphic and more comparable to painting. No longer limited to preparatory drawings or finishing touches, pastel portraits started to appear, with one of the earliest masters of the technique being Robert Nanteuil in France. Rosalba Carriera developed techniques to show the delicacy of skin tone; Maurice Quentin de la Tour the richness of sumptuous materials.

Making Pastels
To make pastels, pure powdered pigments are mixed with a small amount of water containing a binder, such as gum Arabic, into a paste, and then formed into sticks and dried slowly. The ratio of a large amount of pigment to a small amount of binder results in vibrant and intense colours. Each tone requires a different pastel, meaning artists can end up mixing hundreds of crayons.

Applied dry, the immediate colour effect can be seen; artists can work quickly. Techniques like blending and scruffing can be used to control tones and shading; the dry application allows for a rich interplay between medium and support material. This interaction is exemplified by the realism created by Rubén Belloso, a contemporary pastel painter in Spain. Contemporary use of pastels is not limited to realistic and hyper-realistic portraiture. Amos Ashanti Johnson’s art celebrates African and Black American cultural heritages in its iconography and aesthetics. Johnson’s paintings, pastels and drawings, exhibit meticulous draftsmanship, are predominantly figurative and include commemorative or symbolic portraiture.

Bringing Out the Best of Pastels
Brilliant colours, the ability to have both crisp and blurred details, and a sense of a delicate and subtle texture are all reasons artists and collectors alike have fallen in love with pastels.

However, the lack of binding material, and dry application, mean that images are not securely bound to the support material. As described by Paul Desjardins “Pastel is the lightest, most fugitive of techniques—like the pollen of a lily, or the dust from a butterfly’s wing that an artist scatters and fixes on paper.” Fixatives can be used, but many artists feel they reduce the brilliance, change the tone, and flatten the texture of pastels. To avoid damage to the composition, protection through glazing is therefore recommended.

Finding the Right Glazing
The glazing product used needs to be chosen wisely. The static charge generated whilst cleaning many conventional glazing products may be enough to damage friable media, such as pastels.

© Artist or artist’s estate glazed with Optium Museum acrylic Amos Ashanti Johnson’s “African Rainbow,” 1977, is a pastel on paper measuring 84 ¾ by 47 ½ inches from the Paul R. Jones Collection, University Museums.

CHARCOALS, PASTELS, ARTWORK WITH DELICATE SURFACES, LIGHTWEIGHT PAPERS AND TEXTILES. FRIABLE MEDIA MAY SEPARATE FROM THEIR SUPPORT OR CRUMBLE INTO A POWDERY FORM. THESE CAN THEN BE DRAWN AWAY FROM THE ARTWORK ITSELF TOWARDS THE REAR SURFACE OF THE GLAZING, POSSIBLY DAMAGING THE WORK IRREPARABLY. SMALLER AND LIGHTER PARTICLES, SUCH AS FINE POWDER PIGMENTS OF PASTELS, ARE MORE LIKELY TO BE DETERMINATELY AFFECTED BY STATIC CHARGE.

ACRYLIC GLAZING OPTIONS

ACRYLIC GLAZING IS USUALLY AVOIDED WITH SUCH WORKS AS IT TYPICALLY HAS A HIGH STATIC CHARGE. HISTORICALLY, WHEN GLAZING LOOSELY BOUND MEDIA, A PREFERENCE HAS BEEN SHOWN FOR GLASS—IN PARTICULAR LAMINATED GLASS. HOWEVER, A STATIC CHARGE CAN BE GENERATED EVEN ON LAMINATED GLASS, AND CAN TAKE UP TO 11 SECONDS TO DISSIPATE—LONG ENOUGH FOR DAMAGE TO OCCUR.

TRU VUE’S OPTIUM MUSEUM ACRYLIC HAS AN ANTI-STATIC COATING THAT MEANS ANY CHARGE IS NOT ONLY IMMEDIATELY DISSIPATED, BUT IT ALSO STAYS DISSIPATED. THESE ANTI-STATIC QUALITIES ARE INHERENT IN THE PRODUCT AND PERMANENT. IT DOES NOT WIPE AWAY WITH CLEANING NOR NEED TO BE REAPPLIED.

IN FACT, IT REDUCES THE NEED FOR CLEANING, AS THE MATERIAL DOES NOT ATTRACT DUST OR LINT. INDEPENDENT TESTING HAS SHOWN THAT GLAZING WITH AN ANTI-STATIC COATING SUCH AS OPTIUM MUSEUM ACRYLIC, IS SIGNIFICANTLY SAFER FOR LOOSELY BOUND AND FRIABLE WORKS.

BUSINESS STRATEGIES

FINDING NEW BUYERS FOR YOUR ARTISTS

by Katherine Hébert
Finding new art collectors to support your gallery’s artists is not as challenging as it may seem, but the method has changed a bit in the last decade or so. Is your art gallery’s lead generation strategy current? Art collectors are everywhere. By reaching out to the community in new ways and cultivating relationships, you can expand your client base in a short amount of time. Networking differently in person and implementing good inbound marketing practices online should open the tap for finding new art collectors. You will be able to convert more “I’m just looking” leads into actual art buyers.

Finding New Art Buyers

Art gallerists must always be open to new opportunities to connect with potential collectors and know how to keep them engaged with the gallery program. This is how you create strong relationships that lead to art sales.

Most art dealers need to make collectors through education and nurturing rather than hoping they will just come in and buy or see a piece on Instagram and DM the gallery. Of course, that happens, but why limit your sales prospecting.

Typically, opportunities to meet new collectors include walk-ins to the gallery, attendees at events and fairs, online sales platforms or website or social leads, and referrals. If you’re still struggling to keep a steady flow of new leads coming, you may need to be more creative.

• Join a few business networking organizations with members that match your gallery’s collector profile, such as a small business association, marketing association, women’s group, or chamber of commerce.
• Invite other creative businesses to host a meeting or hold a lecture at the gallery. Sweeten the deal by offering discounted rental rates for the opportunity to talk about your gallery program and services briefly. Look for other businesses in your community that serve like-minded clientele. Think designers, makers, fashion, writers, chefs, etc.
• Plan intimate events at the gallery to discuss a non-gallery-related topic, for example, cultural development plans of the city. This helps your gallery brand become known as a hub for a diverse range of dialogues beyond art while increasing exposure to all your artists has to offer.
• Collaborate with other galleries or art communities in your area to create larger-scale events where your gallery will gain exposure to other collectors. Some examples might be a regional art fair, art walk, charity fundraiser, etc.
• Invite Meetup and other private social clubs in your area to the gallery for private showings. These groups tend to appreciate having member programs suggested. Try to select groups and clubs with a similar demographic to your collector base.
• Always ask for referrals. Consider creating an organized workflow around managing referrals, so your sales consultants deliver a consistent and quality experience.
• As you find opportunities to engage with other like-minded groups within the community, make sure you define what you want to gain from the relationship. You also want to plan how relationships from new sources should be handled to maximize your gallery’s potential lead’s initial experience. Map out each step in an ideal case scenario. The process may differ from your gallery’s typical sources, so it’s worth giving it some thought. Doing so will help you make the most of each new opportunity.

• Invest more in inbound gallery marketing

As more lead generation is done online today, investing in inbound marketing is essential for finding new art buyers online. Inbound marketing is a strategy that focuses on drawing in prospective art collectors to your gallery through valuable content that piques their curiosity, answers questions, and provides solutions to their problems.

• This strategy differs from outbound marketing methods that interrupted your potential buyers with unsolicited promotions and content, such as direct mail, print ads, telemarketing, website pop-ups—you get the idea.

Building the Collector Base

You will be able to convert more “I’m just looking” leads into actual art buyers.

Art gallerists must always be open to new opportunities to connect with potential collectors and know how to keep them engaged with the gallery program. This is how you create strong relationships that lead to art sales.

Most art dealers need to make collectors through education and nurturing rather than hoping they will just come in and buy or see a piece on Instagram and DM the gallery. Of course, that happens, but why limit your sales prospecting.

Typically, opportunities to meet new collectors include walk-ins to the gallery, attendees at events and fairs, online sales platforms or website or social leads, and referrals. If you’re still struggling to keep a steady flow of new leads coming, you may need to be more creative.

Typically, opportunities to meet new collectors include walk-ins to the gallery, attendees at events and fairs, online sales platforms or website or social leads, and referrals. If you’re still struggling to keep a steady flow of new leads coming, you may need to be more creative.

The good news: there are lots of ways to do it.

• Get involved with museum groups. Many museums have special interest groups that you can join and be active within on different levels. These are wonderful opportunities because the members already have a shared interest, and the groups provide a more intimate forum for creating relationships.

• Join a few business networking organizations with members that match your gallery’s collector profile, such as a small business association, marketing association, women’s group, or chamber of commerce.

• Involve other creative businesses to host a meeting or hold a lecture at the gallery. Sweeten the deal by offering discounted rental rates for the opportunity to talk about your gallery program and services briefly. Look for other businesses in your community that serve like-minded clientele. Think designers, makers, fashion, writers, chefs, etc.

• Plan intimate events at the gallery to discuss a non-gallery-related topic, for example, cultural development plans of the city. This helps your gallery brand become known as a hub for a diverse range of dialogues beyond art while increasing exposure to all your artists has to offer.

• Collaborate with other galleries or art communities in your area to create larger-scale events where your gallery will gain exposure to other collectors. Some examples might be a regional art fair, art walk, charity fundraiser, etc.

• Involve Meetup and other private social clubs in your area to the gallery for private showings. These groups tend to appreciate having member programs suggested. Try to select groups and clubs with a similar demographic to your collector base.

• Always ask for referrals. Consider creating an organized workflow around managing referrals, so your sales consultants deliver a consistent and quality experience.

As you find opportunities to engage with other like-minded groups within the community, make sure you define what you want to gain from the relationship. You also want to plan how relationships from new sources should be handled to maximize your gallery’s potential lead’s initial experience. Map out each step in an ideal case scenario. The process may differ from your gallery’s typical sources, so it’s worth giving it some thought. Doing so will help you make the most of each new opportunity.

Invest in Inbound Gallery Marketing

Marketing is a strategy that focuses on drawing in prospective art collectors to your gallery through valuable content that piques their curiosity, answers questions, and provides solutions to their problems.

This strategy differs from outbound marketing methods that interrupted your potential buyers with unsolicited promotions and content, such as direct mail, print ads, telemarketing, website pop-ups—you get the idea.

As buyers became savvier and learned to tune out outbound marketing, inbound strategies became more effective. So when it is time for an art lover to buy, your inbound marketing efforts have already established a level of trust. They come to your gallery for art.

Inbound marketing your gallery should be investing in to attract more art buyers primarily means creating entertaining and educational content and promoting it on the best channels for your target collector. I guarantee your gallery is already doing several inbound marketing methods. But there may be room to take it to the next level and increase results.

Content includes regular blog posts that enlighten your readers, videos that entertain and inspire, informative webpages, and social posts about collecting art. The goal is to capture contact details and begin a client journey with your gallery.

Ideas for gallery content might include an e-book on how to hang and care for collections, a webpage about incorporating a collection into an estate plan, blog posts about insurance and developing a collection focus, videos about training the collector’s eye, and more. Informational topics are endless.

If your gallery lacks the resources to produce enough of this kind of content on a consistent and monthly basis, you might consider hiring a part-time content creator. This role could create content and develop ads and landing pages to promote it.

Online Lead Generation Strategy

A typical strategy that works exceptionally well is to draw prospective qualified buyers in with content. You want them to see your content, join your mailing list, download a free e-book, RSVP for an event, or schedule an appointment. The content you create should also align with different stages of the sales journey.

These are all inbound marketing content types that make sense for an art gallery’s content purpose. Once you attract the lead, you can then nurture them through your sales cycle. That’s a whole other topic. Your gallery’s inbound marketing strategy will need to include both quality content and SEO. They work together to attract new art collectors, and one will not be as effective without the other.

Put some time into optimizing all the fabulous content you will be creating for SEO. Remember that it’s not all about keywords. Many factors contribute to how your content gets found online from effective or harmful SEO practices.

Collectors rarely make spontaneous purchases. This is why it is vital to be continually generating leads and growing your contact database through inbound marketing initiatives. Increasing sales is a numbers game by growing leads. No doubt, you know this all too well.

The more comprehensive information you can collect on a prospect, the more empowered the gallery is to close sales. To be successful, you need an easy way to capture, track, and search for information. Some information can be automated. Other details you’ll want to grab on the fly. If you don’t have a robust art gallery management database, get one ASAP.

To find and nurture buyers for your art gallery, consider what interests your collectors have outside of collecting art and get involved in those areas of your community. Look for exciting ways to bring people into the gallery in a non-threatening, non-sales-focused way. Keep an ongoing list of all the opportunities you have to increase your reach with potential art collectors and regularly review the list at staff meetings.

Finding new buyers for your artists doesn’t need to be difficult, but sometimes it requires getting out of your comfort zone and exploring new frontiers.

ART INDUSTRY TRENDS

MAKING THE MOST OF BRANDING & MARKETING

By Litsa Spanos

So you ask, what is the difference between marketing and branding? So many people lump them together, but it’s actually quite simple. Your brand is what we call in the art world “your signature style,” and marketing is how you get your message across.

Branding is behind everything you do. And branding should be part of every marketing effort. A marketing effort is basically another way of saying “an attempt to reach buyers through various channels, such as social media, advertising, emails, direct mail, etc.”

Branding tells people a story—a consistent story. It is not, contrary to popular opinion, simply a logo, a special font, a design layout or a business card. Yes, those are aspects of branding design, but behind all that is the message, style and story your organization is trying to convey to the consumer.

A brand communicates the characteristics, values and style of attributes of a persona, organization or, in your case, your art or framing business. If implemented effectively and consistently, it becomes so iconic one can easily recognize one’s “brand” or “style” within seconds. And more than that, as soon as they see this style and brand, their brain automatically connects to words, phrases, ideas, beliefs and, yes, even stories to that brand.

However, a brand doesn’t say buy me, click here, sign up now, sale or join me at this event. That’s marketing. A brand says, this is me. This is who I am. And because of who I am, you connect to it too on some basic level. You support me. You recommend me to friends. You’re loyal to me.

Brand Building

1. After you’ve established your logo and brand, build and optimize your website. Make sure to invest in great photography and make it easy for people to contact and reach you.

2. Focus on content. Make sure it’s excellent. And remember, it’s not just about selling, but informing. Your site has to offer something to attract buyers to you. Set up a blog, and explore the various channels for your website content, such as eBooks, guest blogs, webinars and podcasts.

3. Define your distribution channels: Social media, email, direct mail and advertising. Make sure to have a consistent schedule of posting and reaching out to people.

4. It’s OK to be spontaneous too—especially on social media. Don’t forget to respond and engage!

As Liane Cordes, a famous author says, “Continuous effort—not strength or intelligence—is the key to unlocking our potential.
