THE ROLE OF CUSTOM FRAMING PROMOTIONS

There are plenty of benefits to running a successful custom framing sales promotion. They can create an opportunity to move existing inventory, introduce new products and services, grow a brand’s awareness and gain new clients, as well as motivate existing ones. And while many industries go into overdrive with holiday promotions this time of year, the custom framing industry has been less likely to do so—especially this year as the home decor boom still seems to be rolling along. But, as inventory flow remains sluggish and prices increase, getting creative with promotions seems to still do the trick and helps increase customer

There is so much going on while so little has been figured out. Economic, social, political—you name it, it’s as perplexing a scene as it has ever been. One day, there is a feeling of moving forward and seemingly stepping backward the next. For many businesses these “inflection points” on the curve are often difficult to get through. Yet these are the times where the new seeds of success are spawned.

In the art and frame industry, many veterans know the flow of innovation percolates during periods of duress. Perhaps out of necessity, business owners’ focus critically shifts to improving methods and re-examining product offerings. In times like these, generally, the rate of innovation briefly pauses until more clear directions can be identified. However, for small businesses like art galleries and framershop, this moment allows management to view the field better and digest what new technologies, products and methods should be brought into the business. Those that learn to pivot will prosper.

All retailers by nature are nimble operators. Art galleries and framershop are among the most adroit. So, once an idea is latched upon in our marketplace, the velocity at which it is adopted is mercurial. This ability to successfully dance to whatever music is playing in the mind of a customer is what makes us unique. Our industry’s speed and ability to synthesize and commercialize evolving aesthetics, trends and emotions into sales is mind-boggling. It’s a skill that has carried us in the past and will certainly sustain us in the present.

For many folks, the first response to uncertainty is a wave of paralysis, being seized by inaction until the landscape is clearer. Good retailers regain their wits quickly and act instinctually to initiate change. Such leadership finds success while many of their peers sit and watch.

AGHASSI GAINS MOMENTUM IN INDUSTRY

Armenian painter and sculptor Aghassi hit the ground running as the world began to reopen from the pandemic. He recently participated in the Beverly Hills Art Show for the first time and received the Best New Artist award presented by the Mayor and the Arts and Culture and Recreation and Parks Commissioners. One of the artist’s bronze sculptures will be exhibited at the 94th Grand National Exhibition of the American Artists Professional League in New York. His oil on canvas painting, “Precaution” was sold for $9,250 during the second annual Studio Auction of the American Artists Professional League. And, he also received the Best Sculpture Award at Artexpo New York earlier in the year.

The beginning of the Covid-19 pandemic brought a change of scenery for Aghassi and new opportunities began to emerge. “I came to Glendale, CA, in mid-2020 to visit my brother-in-law,” he says. “It was during the pandemic and my family and I had to stay for a while. Then I started to receive several offers for collaborations from galleries and decided to stay. It was hard at times because galleries were closed and there were no in-person shows, but I am happy to be here. I have my family with me and I am doing what I love.”

This has lead to an eventful 2022 for him. “This year has been much better after the lockdown was lifted, and I was able to exhibit in New York, San Diego and Beverly Hills, as well as meet with new artists and people who appreciate seeing artwork in person.”

With a new studio and showroom, Aghassi has been working on a new collection of paintings called “Status…”

“Aghassi working on his painting, “Precaution.””

New life in the U.S.

Born in Anjar, a small Armenian village located in Lebanon, Aghassi is best known for his romantic oil on canvas paintings and renaissance-style marble and bronze sculptures of solitary figures.

Returning to in-person events and exhibitions has also inspired Aghassi. “I have been getting so many positive reviews,” he says. “I’m happy that people in different parts of the U.S. appreciate my work and I’m hoping to exhibit it in more cities very soon. I believe that offering galleries paintings and sculpture as an option for their clients is appreciated because not many artists do both. I have also noticed that galleries like the fact that I do not do prints, copies or duplicates of my paintings. They like having one-of-a-kind artwork to offer.” Aghassi does do a few limited edition bronze sculptures.

Inspiration is something that the artist finds all around him. “The environment or my surroundings affects my work. I have been inspired by the places I have lived. Throughout the years; I have lived in Italy, the Middle East and now in the United States and have encountered different people of different cultures. I have gotten to know their struggles, thoughts, ideologies and hopes and this has influenced my work and how I express myself through my art throughout the years.”

With all of this momentum, the artist is looking to expand his gallery network in the coming year. “To me, it is important to collaborate with galleries who are interested in my artwork, have the market for originals and give me the freedom to do what I do.” For further information, telephone (747) 272-4796 or go to the artist’s website located at: www.aghassi.art.

THE ROLE OF FRAMING PROMOTIONS

why it happens. The study estimates that the average retail store will take in up to 19% of its annual sales revenue between Thanksgiving (November 24) and New Year’s Eve (December 31). The desire to get the most out of this time period is often bolstered by running various promotions.

While the marketing landscape is vast for retailers, those in the custom framing market know that it doesn’t necessarily take a big, costly campaign to reach their audience. Utilizing technology, such as social media, e-mail and a business’ website are a great start, but also using paid advertising options from LinkedIn or Google have proven to be invaluable. The key is to keep the promotion realistic for one’s business, meaning that the offers are sustainable enough to keeping the books in the black while also catching consumers’ interest.

Tamar Kratter, owner of SoHo Art & Custom Framing in Toronto’s west end, is currently running a Fall sale promotion meant to encourage gift shopping with an increasing percentage off the more a customer buys—20% off the first custom frame, 25% off the second, and 30% off of three or more. That’s $50 a month for my over 10,000 e-mails. I also send 10,000 flyers via Canada Post to houses in my area. On social media, my Instagram ads are about $1,000.”

Being able to gauge how successful a piece of the marketing plan is can provide a lot of information. “The e-mail to clients is sent with my picture and a personal ‘thank you’ for supporting us all of these years, now 18 and counting. Those e-mails have an open rate of 70% and have made reconnections and brought in many existing clients to purchase.”

Ms. Kratter holds monthly specials that are advertised using Instagram and SoHo’s Google business profile. “Besides the monthly specials, our two most successful sales that we have each year are our anniversary and the holiday promotions. The key is to create repeat customers. If I can get them in the store for the first time, they will come back. The best way to do this is to really know your clients and post on social media things that you know they will like.”

Running a custom framing promotion is also a great way to introduce a new location, and/or present expanded products and services. Parthenon Framing & Printing in Mendorf, NY, recently moved it’s brick-and-mortar location several miles away. Owners Joan and George Bubaris saw this as an opportunity to also expand on their business strategy.

EPHRAIM UREVBU’S ‘THE NAKED TRUTH’

Mixed media artist Ephraim Urevbu of Memphis, TN, presents a collection of work titled, The Naked Truth, An American Story in White, Red and Blue. Featuring more than 75 works of abstract expressionism, the collection presents images meant to ignite conversation on topics such as racism, climate change and history. After a multi-year hiatus, Urevbu used the time to deal with his health—an event that lead to the project’s inspiration. “I have not exhibited my work in over 15 years,” he says. “I was diagnosed with cancer and the experience really opened my eyes. I began to see what it is that I can contribute to the world and how important it is to try to help make changes. I have been re-emerging back into the art world and recently debuted the collection at Artexpo Dallas.”

The artist’s original work is mixed media of acrylic and found objects on canvas retailing from $1,000 to $65,000. Some work is available as hand-pulled serigraphs in editions up to 275, and retailing for $2,500. His use of found objects—such as newspaper clippings—in his originals help to tell the story behind the work.

Born and raised in Nigeria, he moved to the U.S. for college where he attended the Memphis College of Art in Tennessee. Not having experienced racism in Nigeria, America was hard for him as an immigrant and as a person of color. Many of these experiences helped shape the artist that he is today. “The Naked Truth collection is my calling. We are all so connected. What I have discovered is that there is a need to ignite conversation in this industry, especially with where the world is today. I feel that we are heading to a place of no return. It is time to start having conversations and art can ignite them. The idea of being naked means to be vulnerable and shamed. For us to come together and to re-actually look at the issues that divide us—while it may seem hostile—that is the reason that we are fighting.”

Urevbu envisions people walking into a gallery, experiencing the work and when they leave, they may have a different perspective. “They can let their conscience be the guiding light.”

In 1994, the artist opened his own gallery, Urevbu Contemporary in Memphis as a place to feature his work, along with that of underrepresented artists after experiencing racism in the industry. “It was never really my intention to own a gallery,” he says, “but when I graduated from college and seeking gallery representation, I had people turn me away after meeting, face-to-face. It was a hard thing to experience. I knew then that I had to create a place for artwork and artists like me. I wanted it to be like a village gallery with artists from underrepresented areas to have an outlet to show their work and grow their careers.”

Urevbu is currently working on a book about The Naked Truth, as well as creating an apparel line that features his artwork while also building a 7,000-square-foot space in Memphis for area artists. “The space is located in what is considered the dangerous part of town, but what people don’t realize is that the community is full of talented people just looking for an outlet to create and present their work. Just having that option can open a world of possibilities for these artists, one that may not have been available to them before.”

“We had been primarily wholesale in our previous location and would sell to the trade, but after our recent move, we have begun to offer retail custom framing and some art,” Mrs. Bubaris says. “We are slowly building up the retail side and as that grows, we will be doing more promotions to help get the word out. So far this year, the only promotions that we have done has been to offer 20% off of holiday orders that are received before November 30, to help alleviate the last minute rush orders.”

Current promotional plans that are in the works now are all aimed at bringing in more retail sales. “Our website/marketing person is working on the website to let consumers know what we have to offer. And I really want our website and social media to reflect our focus on letting the community know that we are open for more retail business, along with our wholesale work. Because our new location is in somewhat of an industrial area, we tend to get a lot of people coming in asking if they’re in the right place. They will see us on Google and see all of our positive reviews from individuals (not just businesses) and seek us out. That is oftentimes what attracts people the most,” she says.

Expanding beyond just offering wholesale framing to interior designers, art dealers and hotels became a priority for Mrs. Bubaris when the new location was found. “When we decided to move, I felt that it was time to expand our reach as well and we changed our zone to allow for a retail space,” she says. “We now have a little gallery that people can visit and another little room that offers prints and things for sale.”

Towards the end of 2020, Parthenon launched a printing division. This year, sales have been steady and not many promotions were needed to keep work flowing in. “It has been consistently busy for us all through the pandemic, and it still is today. Because of this we haven’t had to do many promotions. But, going forward, our aim is to use our marketing and promotions to boost the retail side of our business. The commercial side has always thrived through word-of-mouth.”

Another aspect of the business that is helpful in getting one’s name out is through charitable work, something that is important to the Bubarises. Parthenon has launched a partnership with One Tree Planted, a 501(c)3 charity with the mission to help global reforestation efforts.

Some custom framers have found that doing promotions linked to specific holidays may not always be effective as the return on investment (ROI) doesn’t match the sales that have been brought in. Casting a broader net by offering a promotion during the winter season, for example, will save time and money than singling out each holiday. This helps to eliminate the need to swap out ads online or replace in-store banners the day after Hanukkah or Christmas.

At Menlo Park Framing in Edison, NJ, owner Mustafa Khan says this year, promotions have been sparse, but staying up-to-date with technology is important. “I used to run promotions that were specific to different holidays, like Mother’s Day and Valentine’s Day, but I found that they didn’t bring in more sales. In fact, they tended to cost more to run them,” he says. “The money spent just wasn’t worth it. I found that I’d rather offer 15% off of everything all year as a way to attract customers to the business. Once they are here, we work on building relationships and connecting with them. That is what has kept people coming back. And if they come in for framing and then see that

PHOTOGRAPHER ERIC HATCH TELLS A STORY

A recent exhibition titled, Glacier in Retreat, held at Mohawk Gallery in Cincinnati, features the large-scale works of photographer Eric K. Hatch of Hatch Photo Artistry in Loveland, OH. Photographed between 2010 and 2022, the collection depicts glaciers whose lives are being shortened by climate change in locations such as Alaska, Iceland, Canada and New Zealand. The show will hang through December 3, 2022, and will open again in 2023 in Enville, OH, in an expanded form.

Hatch has photographed at-risk environments from above the Arctic Circle to New Zealand, as well as the countryside and cities of Europe, Tahiti and much of the United States. “Storytelling is a major component of my photography,” Hatch says. “I always try to tell a story, even if it’s only the tale of a melting glacier. Some of my pictures invite the viewer to make up their own narrative, or to read their own lives into the work.”

His body of work is not limited to landscape and/or location work though. His Faces of Addiction project is a collection of 50 portraits and accompanying life stories of addicted persons shot between 2018 through 2020. Ten of these works have been added to the permanent collection of the Hood Museum of Art in Hanover, NH.

As his work garners more attention, Hatch is looking to expand his gallery network, working closely with them and offering large and small sized work. “Collectors like to see images that they are familiar with in their own lives. I think my works would sell well on the East Coast, because so many of them have been created there,” he says, “but all a gallery owner has to do is inquire about an area, and the odds are good that I can assemble a collection unique to them.”

Hatch’s process starts with the inspiration and the story that needs to be told. “Sometimes, I’m intentionally shooting for a collection, and at other times, the concept of the collection emerges from a body of work—as was the case with my collection titled, Hard Times for These Times, which uses architecture to represent the state-of-mind in post-industrial America.”

Hatch is currently shooting in the southwest of the U.S., with plans to head east in the coming months. “I have a good group of winter works from southeastern Massachusetts planned—South Shore, mainly,” he says. “I’d really like to go to both Cape Cod and Nantucket when it’s way off-season. And of course, there are always Greenland and Antarctica, but I haven’t yet found a way to do that. And I would also like to return to Southern France and the Dordogne.”

For Hatch, having a tangible piece of art that hangs on a wall to be enjoyed by people from many different walks of life, is what will keep the art market going strong.

“I believe in physical prints which will be around long after the power button is switched off, not in non-fungible tokens (NFT),” he says. “Electronic works aren’t durable because about every 12 to 18 years the ability to read the data goes away. Tried to buy a Beta-max tape lately? Insert a floppy disk?”

they can also get printing done, the 15% off helps to close the sale.”

This year, Mr. Khan says that using technology has been the key to promoting the business. “We have not been running many promotions this year but we have found that maintaining our presence on Google, along with positive reviews, has helped us a lot,” he says. “We do promote a 15% discount, but that is year-round to attract customers. We have found that doing promotions, other than Google has been a waste of time and money for us. The relationship with our customers is the most important aspect. We focus on reviews first, as I feel that they carry a lot of weight with prospective customers. I will e-mail all returning customers and ask them to write a review. You would be surprised how many eyes are on Google and that are looking for businesses like ours. Using it has helped us increase our sales.”

Mr. Khan says that it’s the strong relationships, alongside the enticing percentage off, that has been his greatest promotion. “Repeat customers and word-of-mouth have been our best promotions. We make sure to go above and beyond for service, collect lots of information (remembering birthdays, anniversaries, etc.) and send out personal gifts, which is something that other businesses wouldn’t do. It’s the small gestures that leave a lasting impression.”

On big jobs, he does not charge for delivery and for quick framing jobs needed for a funeral, he will provide it for free. “At the end of the day, people just appreciate good service from people that they like,” he says. “We know the importance of building a community.”

Looking to the future, Mr. Khan says that consumers will be seeking for ways to save money. “As signs of a recession loom, we are thinking of new strategies to prepare. In the mind of many people, the recession is already here. The dilemma is how to keep customers during this time. We are already seeing that people are looking for ways to save money. I am thinking of running a marketing promotion with ‘recession pricing’ listed. It’s going to be an adjustment period for a lot of people and we want them to know that we are with them.”

At Westport River Gallery in Westport, CT, Ken Warren, co-owner with his wife Pat, says that using framing promotions can help to educate collectors as well.

“We are some new art buyers who just assume that if they buy artwork, the framing is free or included at no extra cost,” he says. “Promoting custom framing and its options can help to eliminate that conversation and let people know the importance, cost and artistry that goes into framing a piece of art.”

Mr. Warren has also offered framing promotions to help move product and bring in sales as the cost of running a frameshop goes up. “While many framing companies have increased prices three to four times in the past 18 months and some consumers have discovered backup plans (discount frame outlets and online-only framers, etc.), getting creative has helped to keep business moving. I have often bought out a bunch of frames and offered them at great prices to mostly artists who need several realistically priced framing pieces.”

“I do think that people are less likely to haggle over what is charged for custom framing today,” he says. “In an odd turn of events, custom framers actually benefit from this since clients assume the prices are high at this time because prices have gone up on everything. We find people just assume it will cost more than before the pandemic. No promotion needed.”

FRAMING SALES IDEAS

GETTING CREATIVE WITH HOLIDAY GIFTS

It’s no secret that inflation and supply chains are making the headlines this year as we enter the peak holiday shopping season. In fact, it is a top domestic issue facing the U.S. at this moment with the White House even getting involved. On top of that, this year’s holiday season feels even more important because we are finally able to gather again after being kept apart. After the events of the past few years, it’s safe to say that nobody is taking this time to gather with family and exchange gifts for granted.

The headlines about empty shelves and hard-to-find gifts are just another example of how we will need to adapt and overcome. One thing is for certain: if there ever was a year to get creative and think outside-the-box with your gift ideas, this is the one.

The Benefits of A Custom Framed Gift

It’s true that coming up with a personal and thoughtful gift idea often takes a bit more time and effort than grabbing something from a store and wrapping it up. But that doesn’t mean it has to be difficult. It’s also the time and effort that makes these types of gifts all the more special. If you are looking for a thoughtful and creative gift idea this holiday season, look no further than a custom framed memory. Here are some of the top benefits of considering a custom framed gift:

• Personal and emotional touch. Taking the time to conceptualize and bring an idea to life shows how much you care. Considering a custom framed gift shows that time, thought and effort went into the idea.
• Supporting local businesses. Did you know that 80% of brick and mortar custom framing shops are independently owned and operated? Shopping locally helps support the local economy and is known to be better for the environment because the items require less packaging and fuel for transport.
• Opportunity to preserve memories for a lifetime. Be sure to ask your custom framer about the many options to ensure your gift lasts a lifetime. Examples of this include different types of frames and matting along with upgrading to premium glass options such as Tru Vue’s Museum Glass.

Creative and Thoughtful Custom Framed Gift Ideas

• Framed milestone life event documents. Consider finding physical evidence of an achievement that your loved one has completed and get it framed. The best options for this tend to be something that the person is proud of. A few examples of this could include:
  • College or High School Diplomas
  • Birth announcement of a child
  • Awards or recognitions
  • Wedding invitations
  • Meaningful letters

• Allows gift givers to show creativity. Custom framed gift giving offers you the opportunity to show off your creativity and craft a unique one-of-a-kind style for your loved ones. Don’t worry too much if you struggle in the creativity department, that’s what local custom framers are here for. They will be able to lend advice and help you hone in on the perfect options!

WHAT’S GLOVES GOT TO DO WITH IT?

by Kelly Bennett, founder of Art Pro Net

What do many people think of when they consider art handling? White cotton gloves. From staged photos to high-end “white glove” services, people everywhere correlate these symbols of careful handling with collections care. The truth though is for 90% of your art handling needs, these gloves are the worst possible option. They fit poorly, snag on delicate edges and make it almost impossible to feel and hold the objects securely as you move them. If there is one tip I can give anyone who works with collections, it would be to throw out all of the cotton gloves they have in their supplies now!

There are so many better options today. These can vary from disposable to reusable. It really depends on what type of objects you are working with. The true workhorse option is to use a disposable powder-free nitrile glove. You can pick these up in lots of places including your local drugstore. It is important to get the powder-free ones so you don’t risk powder transferring to your collections. Also, avoid gloves with texture or ribs on them. These sorts of features might seem helpful for maintaining a hold on things, but they can end up leaving indentations on the surface of materials.

If you are working with framed works or heavier objects, take a look at nitrile-dipped gloves. They are heavier-duty and help when handling rougher textures. They also help when working with gloves on for a long time since they breath better than nitriles.

It is important to remember that you should never wear gloves to handle artwork AND equipment. For example, if you are working in a space installing art and need to use a ladder, you should not move an object and then move your ladder while wearing the same gloves. Metal and dirt can easily transfer from one place to another on your hands. To help with this, you can create two buckets of gloves. The first is for clean new gloves and the second is for dirty gloves that can be reused to handle crates, ladders and other things where you might want protective gloves.

Pro Tip: Be very careful about reusing these gloves. If you are ever unsure about which side is the inside when you go to put nitrile gloves back on, don’t use them. They make your hands sweat and the oils inside reused gloves can do damage to work if put on inside out.

Many people like cotton gloves because they can be washed, and see nitrile gloves as a less ecological option. There are many ways out there to recycle materials now, and by utilizing a service like Terra Cycle you can responsibly use them.

The last type of gloves that are great for collection care is…surprisingly…not wearing gloves at all. Oftentimes, clean dry hands are the best option for delicate porcelain and ceramic objects. Works on paper are usually handled with clean hands because it is easy to break and snag the edges of the fragile paper with a rubbery glove surface. Always wash your hands with soap and water, and dry thoroughly. Be careful to avoid touching your hair, face and other places on your body where oils might transfer while you are using this method. It takes a lot of concentration when working without gloves but it can allow you to feel the objects while handling them more gently.

Gloves are just one way in which we care for collections. Whatever you do, make sure that you can feel the object. If it weakens, cracks, shifts or tears it is vital that you can adjust and protect it. Always know where you are headed with an object and have a clear pathway to help avoid damaging the object. Think through all the steps, and when working on a team don’t assume people are trained in your process. No matter how long you have been handling objects it is never a bad idea to get a refresher.
